Bonnie and Clyde Syndrome: Attraction to the Most Dangerous Narcissists (Transcend Mediocrity Book 124) J.B. Snow

Many of my readers email me because they need help and advice in their relationship with a narcissist. They are either looking to get away from a narcissist's abuse, to outsmart him. Some of them are even looking for ways to remain in the relationship as the narcissist's primary supply. They are aware of the triangulation, compartmentalization, gas-lighting and manipulation tactics of their narcissists, but they are willing to put up with these in order to maintain a relationship with him.

People who are with narcissists can have either a very emotionally damaging relationship with him, or they can find ways to have a healthy relationship with him. The narcissist is very immature emotionally, and thus it is likely that he will never seek to grow or change himself. We may be able to teach the narcissist some manners in his relations with others. This is the target of some of my books: teaching people how to better relate to a narcissist and to fix many aspects of the relationship.

There are many reasons that a person is likely to date a narcissist. They might have been the subject of narcissistic abuse by their mother or their father, and thus the relationship with a narcissist feels familiar. They may have commitment issues which make them more comfortable about someone else who has commitment issues. They might have a masochistic personality, which allows them to take pleasure in the pain that the narcissist provides for them in the relationship. They feel that they deserve his wrath and that they do not deserve a healthy individual in a relationship.

This desire to be with a person who is harmful, fatal or dangerous is an addiction in and of itself. It either originates from a deep hatred for oneself or an addiction to danger and excitement. This ebook seeks to define the "Bonnie and Clyde Syndrome" and to provide possible causes for the syndrome.

One interesting case of Bonnie and Clyde Syndrome that has recently been aired is the Steven Avery case. At the end of "Making a Murderer", we see a new girlfriend take an interest in dating Steven Avery. She begins writing to him in prison and forges a bond with him. Avery could possibly spend the rest of his life in the prison system, so why would anyone want to date him at the lowest point in his life?
