The Train of Longing Timothy Barr

Written between the ages of eighteen and thirty-nine, these poems reflect one gay man's struggle with his sexuality, relationships, and life in and out of the closet. One would think the resulting poems would be overwhelmingly dark, but that is not the case. Yes, there are brooding moments here, naturally. But there are also light and playful moments. Timothy Barr has a natural inclination toward the lyrical without being bogged down by rigid structure (with a few notable exceptions, such as some Shakespearean-inspired sonnets). With imagery that is at turns surprising, disturbing, fun and sometimes just plain quirky, there are no hard and fast life lessons here; there is only experience.
